Delhi the traditional and present-day capital of India is a strategic point in northern India and has been a coveted prize for conquerors since time immemorial. It is built within the magnificent remains of centuries of empires, indigenous and foreign, and is the perfect introduction to India. Tradition places its beginning at c. 1450 B.C.E. but Delhi's history can be reconstructed more accurately after 800 C.E., since then eight cities have been constructed in the same area. The Mughal Emperor Shah Jahan built the seventh city of Delhi, Shahjahanabad, in 1648 containing the famous Red Fort and Jama Masjid. The British moved their Capital from Calcutta to Delhi in 1911 and another city, New Delhi, was constructed according to the majestic plans of Edwin Lutyens. When India became independent in 1947, New Delhi continued to be its Capital. Thus, Delhi has successively been a Capital city to princes, sultans, viceroys, and contemporary parliamentary government.
